How to close off a living room

Open floor plans give a spacious feel to your home but they can take away privacy. Setting up rooms within a room with partial walls, fabric dividers, open shelves and other innovative ways can create an intimate atmosphere, giving visual and, sometimes, auditory isolation. Here are ideas on how to divide a room without a wall. Bring in dividers that still maintain a sense of openness.Remember to click on the image to see more of the design professional’s work and their contact details1. Accentuate with screensScreens help create a room within a room while adding to the aesthetic appeal. In this space, Moriq Interiors demarcates the dining space with wooden slatted screens, which let through light, views and foot traffic. The screens can be swivelled shut to segregate the dining completely when required. This is an ingenious wall partition design for the living room in an open-plan living space for the when you want a little bit of privacy for both dining area and the seating zone.2. Isolate with curtains and blindsA no-fuss way to isolate areas in an open floor plan is to use curtains for partition. For a quirky twist, use bead curtains instead of fabric ones, as shown in the image. Bead curtains create a semi-private barrier that blocks the view but one can walk through. The beads can be made of glass, plastic, bamboo or even acrylic.Find a designer to design your storageLouvres (blinds or shutters with movable slats) can very effective in shielding the view. The pleated ones here, by SAK Designs, can be pulled down to divide the interconnected spaces of the living room or rolled up to expand the space.Tip: Try wooden blinds; they will bring a touch of sophistication and warmth to your home.See how other homes have used partitions3. Open shelvesDividers such as open shelves can enhance the aesthetic appeal of a room and also let light through. You can leave some shelves bare to ensure visibility and display your artefacts or books on the others. Doing so gives the illusion of a bigger space while sectioning off two zones.4. Fixed or sliding glass partitionsThis translucent glass partition doubles as an interior window and is framed in grey to be in sync with the rest of the furniture. The floor-to-ceiling divider gives a clear view of both the kitchen and the living room. One can also install a sliding door partitions that can be pulled shut to block out kitchen noises and fumes.5. Set up a counterWhile I like to huddle with my family at mealtimes, I do want to keep the area off limits when I cook and channel my inner Masterchef. Designer Kamal Preet goes for a kitchen island to draw an soft boundary around the space while maintaining connectivity with the rest of the house.6. Delineate with levelsSetting up distinct boundaries between zones by varying the floor levels can also help divide a space. The step-down living area by The Orange Lane segregates the lounge from the rest of the home. Besides differing levels, the Morroccan-inspired motifs and the wood-and-glass partition further visually demarcate two separate zones. Tip: Worried about accidents if someone misses a step? Use different floor colours to separate the step-down area. Living rooms serve different purposes for different people. In some homes, they serve as the main gathering area for family, while in others they're more of a showroom, used only when company comes over. Either way, there are certain issues that always come up when trying to arrange living room furniture. Check out these tips for placing furniture in your living room. There are a few important things to remember when arranging living room furniture: Establish the focal point of the room and arrange furniture around it. In some rooms, the focal point will be an existing feature such as a fireplace or window, and in some, it will be something you bring in to the room such as a television. Use the furniture to create conversation areas. People should be able to comfortably talk to each other without straining their necks or shouting. If the room is particularly large, you might want to create a few different conversation areas. Don't forget about the traffic flow. Leave enough room for people to walk around furniture so they can easily get from one side of the room to another. Pull furniture away from the walls. Having all the furniture backs touching the walls is one of the biggest mistakes people make in the living room. Placing the pieces closer together, will create a more intimate setting. As long as the backs of the pieces are finished, there's no reason not to show them off. The Spruce / Michelle Becker When it comes to living room furniture, size matters. Sofa and Chairs - These are often the big-ticket items, so it's important that they suit the space. The most important thing to do is measure the space before buying any of these pieces. You don't want them to be too big or too small, so it's best if you draw up a floor plan ahead of time. Sketch out the room on a piece of graph paper using all the appropriate measurements. Try putting the sofa and chairs in a few different spots and see what works best visually and in terms of leaving space to accommodate traffic flow. Rug – Using area rugs is a great way to define seating areas, but the number one mistake people make in the living room is using an area rug that's too small. Remember that all of the furniture should be able to comfortably sit on the carpet. If space doesn't allow it, make sure that at least the front legs of any large upholstered pieces are on the rug. Coffee Table - Coffee tables are practical pieces that are often found in the center of conversation areas. If you choose to use, one remember that the height should be slightly lower than the seat height of the sofa and chairs around it. The length of the table should also be roughly one half to two thirds the length of the sofa. If you don't want to use a coffee table you can try using a couple of smaller tables or benches to achieve the same look. Just make sure they're not too small. People sitting around them should be able to lean over to put down or pick up a drink without having to get up from their seat. At the same time be sure to leave enough leg room between seats and tables: 14 to 18 inches should do the trick. Side Tables - Side tables tend to be an afterthought, but they're important. The number you need will depend on how much seating you have. Everyone should be able to comfortably set down a drink without having to get up and walk over to a table. Try to have one on either side of the sofa, and between pairs of chairs. The key is to have enough surface space without overcrowding the room. The tables should be approximately the same height as the arm of the chair or sofa they're next to. The Spruce / Michelle Becker Once the furniture is in place, it's important to think about where to place the accessories. No doubt you will have some window treatments and artwork, and maybe a television and some sconces. Give just as much thought to placing living room accessories as you do the furniture. If you're unsure about what will work try using an online room planner to create an arrangement. Test out some different looks and see what looks best and what works for your lifestyle. If you're not too computer savvy, you can make up a living room floor plan using graph paper. Just make sure to use all the appropriate measurements, so you don't face any unwelcome surprises when you put the furniture in the room. But going for a full-on reno is pricey to say the least, or if you’re renting, not an option at all. Room dividers are a great way to break up your space and can also double as décor. Your options include folding dividers, curtains, large bookcases, and more. You can use them to change up the layout of a room, provide extra privacy, maximize storage space, or just create a change of scenery.So ahead, 16 ways you can use room dividers to create a customized space that’s rental- and budget-friendly.This studio apartment separates a bed from the rest of the space with a clothing rack that houses décor rather than clothes.The bedroom in this home doesn’t have a door, so curtains get the job done in a snap. We love how their color contrasts against the printed wallpaper in the living room.The room divider separating the bed from the front door of this studio apartment is actually custom window shutters. They offer privacy when closed and natural light when opened.Bookworm or not, a bookshelf can be a stylish and effective way of breaking up a space and separating out different “rooms” or areas. This Pennsylvania loft in an old textile factory shows how a piece like this can look like it was almost built into the space.A wall of plants is the perfect thing to section off a space and make for more privacy. This crafty loft uses a shelving unit to close off the bedroom area while also providing a statement piece and a workspace. Talk about resourceful!For ultra tiny living, you have to get creative. Curtains are usually a great option to turn to, as demonstrated in this itty bitty trailer.For a bigger project, you can install a barn door to break up space. This home in Valencia shows how you can easily break up an open floor plan with a sliding door.You don’t always have to go shopping for brand new dividers to split up a space. This Los Angeles studio shows how you can break up a room with furniture you already have—in this case a couch—making your sleeping space feel more separate from your living room.Stacked shelves from IKEA were framed with millwork in this Chelsea apartment to create a barrier between a functional entryway and a bedroom. Not only does it serve as a wall, but it comes with plenty of extra storage space, too.Splitting up a room doesn’t mean you have to create a “wall.” Instead of visually closing things off, play with different levels within a room instead. This kids’ room, with its elevated bed, was created by Studio Oink.While the chairs, couch, and tables make this area in a Detroit loft look like its own separate room, the rug is what really pulls it together. Using a color that deeply contrasts against your floor can help create “boundaries” in a space.How about a temporary wall? The owners of this Dutch home got creative and made two wooden partitions to separate their kids’ beds, allowing for a little more privacy and a small entryway.A desk, bookshelf, and area rug in this Miami apartment shows how the right pieces can make a studio feel like it actually has rooms, or at least designated areas. You’ve got a place to eat, sleep, and work—no doors necessary.Extra storage and a room divider? It’s a win-win. The underside of this rolling cart table in an Oakland apartment serves as a movable form of kitchen organization. Plus, it breaks up the space between the kitchen and rest of the house, creating a mini dining area.If it’s simply a doorway that’s preventing you from really separating your spaces, a curtain of beads is one of the easiest solutions, as seen in this Brooklyn apartment.Additional reporting by Carolin LehmannMelissa EpifanoContributorMelissa is a freelance writer who covers home decor, beauty, and fashion.
